Yashvardhan Raichand is a snob, he breaks off relations with his eldest son Rahul for marrying a girl with a lower social status. His wife is also a co-founder of another company. Consequently, he is denied all his property claims. But it turns out that Ananda might just as well lay claim to some money. Then a battle ensues between them, which ends with Ananda's unexpected victory. It also reveals where the money that Rahul once earned by heading a joint venture comes from. However, I seem to be faced with a more complex and long-term question. In the film, we see the two protagonists dealing with multifaceted problems: the government is flexible enough to resolve differences, business is minding its own business, and so on. And yet, I still have a residue from the film that I was not shown the main line - the relationship between Ananda and Sripad. What does he care about Sripad, whatever he is? Who is Sripad? The film itself is a ballad in two acts: the first act (on the screen) is a purely Indian story, the other - later - became more philosophical: a love and death story. The film surprisingly conveys both the complete intimacy of the relationship between the characters, and Sripad's desire to interfere in the personal lives of his rivals. Not only does he not limit himself to the choice between a mistress and a lover (who, by the way, are not two, as in the movies), but he also tries to involve his children in the novel. Although Ananda does not want to tie his fate to his daughter, he is forced to submit. He yields to his father, although until recently he felt free from family ties. So why should he still obey? I do not know the answer to this question. Apparently, I was not ready for this yet. Moreover, the film has a script. Text that does not provide a specific answer to a question. The script remains one of the main images of the film. At its beginning, Sripad suggests that Ananda be tried if necessary, but then decides to withdraw from the case.He confesses that he needs not just a brother, but a brother who could support him in difficult times. For Anandina's determination does not bode well for him. As for Sripad... It seems to me that he does not really understand what he wants. Anandin's love story, retold in his own language, has always remained
