ECC includes techniques such as single-error correction, double-error detection, and single-error detection. Single-error correction, double-error detection and single-error detection are collectively known as single-error correction, double-error detection (SECDED), and single-error detection (SED). The technique used for SECDED and SED depends on the size of the error-correcting code. Code of length 1 is called a parity bit. The technique used for SECDED is called a parity bit error correction (PBC) technique. Both the data and the parity bits are stored on a storage medium. The data bits and the parity bits are read from the storage medium, and are then transmitted to a receiver. The SECDED technique combines the data bits with the parity bits to generate a product of 0's and 1's, i.e., a codeword.
