Q: How to check if object is NULL in Python

Is there a short way to check if an object in Python is NULL or None or not (you know, the absense of an object)? I'm coding for myself and often I forget to check if the object is empty before using it. Sometimes I do it with try-except, but I often have the following situation where I cannot use try-except: The object I want to check could be any of the following, and I am 99% sure it's not None or an empty string or null

- A string - if I cannot use try-except because it may fail because of encoding
- An integer - if I cannot use try-except because it may fail because of division or unsupported operation
- A dictionary - if I cannot use try-except because I don't know the keys and values of that object
- A list - if I cannot use try-except because there could be an empty element
- A function (Python built-in or 3rd party) - if I cannot use try-except because it may fail because of division or unsupported operation
- A datetime - if I cannot use try-except because I'm working with dates and not with times

So is there a good practice or "Pythonic" way to check that an object is not None or an empty string or null?

A: It depends how you're going to use the object. If you just plan on using it in a non-checking sense, then you can use the `is` syntax in a try clause and you can use a None value to indicate an error. If you have a Python list and you plan on iterating over it, then you can use the `has_key` method and it will tell you if the value is not None

For dictionaries, I would use `is_instance` or use `get_attribute` if it's a builtin.

import types
if isinstance(data, types.BuiltinFunctionType):
    pass
if not data:
    pass

If it's a Python 2

datetime object and you want to use it for a non-checking purpose, then you can use the `type(data).__name`
