Crude oil and other hydrocarbon-containing materials are often produced from subterranean reservoirs. In the case of some hydrocarbon-containing reservoirs, gas may be produced along with the hydrocarbons. Recovery of the gas from the reservoir is typically challenging and contributes significantly to the cost of recovery. The challenge of gas production is primarily due to the immiscibility of the gas and crude oil. Gas is typically produced with the aid of a water-based fluid (i.e., emulsions, micellar solutions and microemulsions) because the gas tends to float at the water-oil interface. Recovery of gas (and the attendant production costs) is complicated by the fact that, as the water-based fluid tends to incorporate the gas, the water-based fluid ultimately becomes a gas-rich "emulsion" or "microemulsion." As the water-based fluid becomes more water-rich (as is typically the case when the water-based fluid incorporates much of the gas), the fluid may have a tendency to become unstable (i.e., undergo phase separation, flocculation and/or coalescence). In the case of emulsions or microemulsions, droplets may form, at least to some extent, and the droplets may either coalesce with each other or remain at the top of the wellbore, while the hydrocarbons flow to the bottom of the wellbore. In either case, there is a delay in the flow of hydrocarbons 09e8f5149f

Although the concept of non-invasive pain therapy for alleviating the suffering of people with chronic pain is well established (eg, U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,713,861 and 5,620,431), such therapy has received limited acceptance. There are two potential problems in the use of RF and microwave devices for this purpose. One problem is the ability of the radiating antenna to penetrate the skin. Another problem is the inability of the systems to accurately and predictably treat an area of pain which is very small, such as a localized pain area in a joint. A major advantage of non-invasive pain therapy is the elimination of the side effects associated with other pain therapies. Although the use of RF and microwave radiation in non-invasive pain therapy has the advantage of being safe and efficacious in treating many different types of pain, there are still significant problems that prevent widespread acceptance of such devices. For instance, most pain therapies generate large amounts of heat which can cause undesired skin damage if not carefully controlled. So, the RF or microwave source must be placed very close to the skin surface to insure that the absorbed heat is effectively dissipated. But, such close proximity with the skin undesirably limits the size of the desired treatment area. An additional problem with RF and microwave devices is in the effective delivery of the microwave or RF radiation
