Localized deletions of the proximal promoter region of the human MST1 gene identified in sporadic prostate cancers. Metastasis suppressor 1 (MST1), also called STK4, is a serine/threonine kinase involved in many cell regulatory processes, such as apoptosis, migration, and autophagy. However, MST1/STK4 is rarely known to be involved in human cancer, and the pathophysiological role of MST1 in cancer is still controversial. We previously reported that MST1 was downregulated in prostate cancer (PCa) cell lines by gene expression profiling. In this study, we performed gene-targeting experiments and identified a unique deletion of the promoter region in localized PCa. To further characterize the association of MST1 expression and PCa development and progression, we analyzed MST1 expression in a series of prostate tissues. In PCa, the MST1 expression was remarkably reduced in areas with malignant glands. Also, clinicopathological and biochemical findings showed lower MST1 protein expression in high-stage and high-grade tumors compared with low-stage and low-grade tumors. Moreover, a unique deletion of the promoter region was identified in localized PCa by PCR analysis. In vitro MST1 promoter analyses using luciferase assays and chromatin immunoprecipitation assays revealed that the deletion impaired both transcriptional activation by beta-catenin and the binding of TATA-box 3c33713323
