The search engine company has started to link to its search results to WeChat, a messaging app. China has a strong symbiosis between its search engine giants and the country's dominant social app. And now Baidu is seemingly getting involved in the competition between the two by citing its search results on WeChat. Baidu's China chief Qi Lu took to his personal WeChat account yesterday to highlight the service. His tweet was in response to a WeChat user who had asked Mr Lu's wife to get online. "WeChat will work through Baidu, which is said to be the best platform for searching," Mr Lu wrote. "WeChat is more convenient, flexible and user-friendly than traditional Chinese search engines". It's not clear whether this rivalry between Baidu and Google will do much to change the online landscape in China. According to Baidu's most recent data, Google remains the dominant search engine at 60% of the market, with Baidu coming in at just over 28%. Chinese internet users traditionally favour Baidu over Google, but that might be changing. The country's growing middle class are now drawn to the Internet. Just 17% of the Chinese people said they were online this year, up from 11% in 2011. And a lot of the increase in online activity is now taking place on messaging apps, which are far more popular among younger people. On WeChat, Chinese users can send messages to other users, and can also pay for goods and services via the app. There are now 50 million monthly active users, and the app will soon release a payment feature, enabling users to buy and sell digital products and services. But it's unclear how much success the app will have outside of China. China is a huge market with the nation's mobile internet users totalling 277 million, more than half 79a2804d6b
