Treatment of primary systemic amyloidosis in a young adult: case report. Systemic amyloidosis is an uncommon hematologic malignancy characterized by the progressive deposition of amorphous extracellular protein in vital organs. The diagnosis is largely based on tissue biopsy and, in addition to the amyloid light chain used to characterize the amyloid, it can be subtyped immunophenotypically. The disease process typically is of an aggressive nature and culminates in organ failure. Treatment is predominantly chemotherapy, but rarely has curative potential. We report a case of primary systemic amyloidosis (AL) in a young adult treated with chemotherapy, plasmapheresis, and stem cell transplantation. The patient exhibited significant improvement in her clinical condition and functional status after treatment. Tilap 79a2804d6b
