As described in Patent Literature 1, when a urea solution is supplied to the NOx catalyst, a catalyst in which the NOx is stored is activated. Therefore, when the urea solution is supplied to the NOx catalyst, the catalyst is activated at a higher speed as compared with a case where only the urea solution is supplied to the NOx catalyst without supplying the urea solution. As a result of carrying out, at the same time, not only supplying the urea solution but also supplying secondary air to the NOx catalyst, a surplus amount of a urea solution is decreased as compared with a case where only the urea solution is supplied to the NOx catalyst. As a result, urea may be reduced by not only the urea solution but also the secondary air in the NOx catalyst. Therefore, a NOx conversion performance may be increased in the NOx catalyst. In a catalyst purifying system described in Patent Literature 2, a urea solution is first stored in an adsorbing container having a plurality of adsorbing regions, and the stored urea solution is supplied to a NOx catalyst when the NOx catalyst is activated. When the supplied urea solution adsorbs NOx in the NOx catalyst, the adsorbed NOx is reduced by the supplied urea solution.Q: how to sort multiid
