The invention more particularly relates to the separation of alkali metal tetraborates from alkali metal borates by dissolving the borate in an aqueous solution of alkali metal hydroxide and separating the borate from the solution by separating the alkali metal borate from the solution and heating the borate to drive off the alkali metal hydroxide. It is known to remove the borate from a solution of the borate by heating the borate and separating the borate from the solution. See for example U.S. Pat. No. 3,190,950 to Bottenbruch, granted June 22, 1965. However, this known process is not suitable for removing the borate from a solution containing dissolved alkali metal borate and alkali metal hydroxide because the borate will decompose in the heating process to form a mixture containing alkali metal tetraborate and alkali metal hydroxide. It is also known to separate borates from alkali metal borates by separating the borate from a solution of the borate in an aqueous solution of alkali metal hydroxide using ion exchange columns. See for example U.S. Pat. No. 4,149,966 to Wennerberg, granted Apr. 17, 1979 and U.
