georgiaazabou@gmail.com Oxygenation and antiinflammatory effects of inhaled nitric oxide in vivo in the newborn piglet. The effects of inhaled nitric oxide were studied in a newborn piglet model. Nitric oxide was administered in an air/carbon dioxide mixture with the aim of obtaining physiological airway concentrations. A nonlinear regression analysis of the effect of 50 ppm nitric oxide on arterial oxygen tension was performed. Good agreement was obtained between the prediction and the observed effects, which was confirmed by comparing results from full gas analyses with estimates based on linear measurements of oxygen and nitric oxide concentrations. The effect of 50 ppm nitric oxide on airway oxygen tension was 36 mm Hg. In vitro, 50 ppm nitric oxide reduced the sheep erythrocyte-induced aggregation in whole blood from 18.2% +/- 0.83 to 9.83% +/- 0.40, whereas inhaled nitric oxide reduced the sheep erythrocyte aggregation in whole blood from 19.1% +/- 0.95 to 13.6% +/- 0.32. Nineteen to 32 ppm nitric oxide produced equivalent effects. The antiinflammatory effect of 50 ppm nitric oxide was assessed by measuring the histamine-induced increase in microvascular leakage in the skin (phlebograph) as an index of vascular permeability. Inhaled nitric oxide reduced the increase in permeability from 25% +/- 4.5 to 12.9% +/- 2.6 (P < 0.04).
