One of the biggest but most under-advertised features in the CC release is the automatic retouching for every photo uploaded. This results in a quick, greener, photo, which is perfect for online portfolios and social media publishing. If you upload a photo, you'll be presented with three options:

- Share for editing: Photos are uploaded, and Photoshop automatically opens in an editing interface. You can then click to share.
- Save for future touchups: Photos are uploaded to Photoshop, which turns the file into a cloud document, so you can work on them in the new Sketch & Slide design interface.
- Keep as is: The original image is uploaded, no changes are made.

Adobe may have moved into post-production. They own the photography and video editing market, and create the tools that professionals use to produce the content and surround themselves with those who know how to edit it. It's a strong position to be in, and seems to be paying off — according to CNET, Adobe decided to move out of the photo editing business and focus on content creation.

Slideshow creation, built right into Photoshop, is a massive feature that enables you to fit a huge number of images into a slide show on one panel, all in one place. All the images come in as the slides are created. While you can't cram 100 photos into a moving picture, even an expansive handful of photos give a quick and easy glimpse into a location, or to give your contact list an at-a-glance, purely digital, slideshow.
