If you use Lightroom, you already know what to expect, but for those who have used any of the earlier versions, there are a few new changes made to the experience. With the upgrade, you can now see metadata from images being imported. A new Export to Adobe Bridge window allows the importing of images into the Adobe Bridge catalogue. You can preview images before you create a collection, view a thumbnail of each image within the collection, and quickly access the original images, all within the same window.

Batch processing is definitely a huge plus when it comes to the speed of Lightroom. However, the problem with Adobe's new process is that it actually does not save you any time in relation to the importing process of a new file into Lightroom, especially if you are working with the Standard size edition of Lightroom or use a lot of the batch processing functionalities. That said, using the well-documented process of exporting, performing edits and so on makes the Lightroom process behind-the-scenes seamless. Even so, that is not enough to make the whole process any faster. All in all, Adobe has some way to go in terms of making the entire Lightroom experience less cumbersome. For example, in the recent update to Lightroom, we saw the introduction of archive boxes that at times can make much of the import process less important, as once Adobe copies the files into the archive box, the whole process is almost completely automated. Perhaps the best way to address that is to provide the user with an overarching organizational tool. This is something Apple has been pioneering with its Photos app for quite a few years now, so Adobe should consider bringing that to Lightroom, since it seems to be a great time to start.

What's more is that the layers are not only for to layer and position; usually, a layer is just to bring a new visual appearance to the image. In fact, just a layer can bring the changes in the image and create contrast.
