Lightroom 5.0 still features the same workflow preferences that were updated in Lightroom 4.3. This is good, because Lightroom users often have adjusted their presets or other preferences. If a user wants to move away from the default workspace, Lightroom 5.0 offers the same tabbed workspace design as previous versions, with a maximum of 10 workspaces functioning within one Lightroom catalog. There's one workspace for Images, another for Slides, a third for Photos, a fourth for Videos, and so on. Each workspace comes with stacks, which are basically folders, for assets. Files in a workspace can be added files, dropped files, imported folders, and so forth. There's also a little menu box just to the left of the workspace title that allows individual files in a workspace to be tagged with specific metadata. Lightroom 5.0's workspace is also available in a browser window. Lightroom users will need to click the lightbulb-like button in the upper-left to make this menu available. Swapping clients between Lightroom and Adobe Camera Raw is still a work in itself, with Lightroom 5.0 not offering any significant updates in this area.

Lightroom 5.0 still maintains the Library window that debuted in Lightroom 4.3. It's very functional, but doesn't offer anything that could not be accomplished with a third-party library management utility like DigiKam. There is also a new Content Browser, which organizes images into a grid-system layout. By default, all images are grouped into a single "Recent" Collection. There are, however, ways to change this grouping to include more than one collection. The same goes for Lightroom 5's Slideshow, in which images can be organized into their own collections. Slideshows can even be exported using Apple's iMovie app.
