Adult and pediatric gastroenterologists' attitudes and comfort with adult weight management for obesity. Obesity is an important health problem, particularly for adults. To examine adult and pediatric gastroenterologists' attitudes and comfort with adult weight management for obesity. A nationally representative sample of 182 gastroenterologists completed a validated survey, including the attitudes and comfort measures. Among respondents (n = 163), 97% were interested or very interested in examining obese patients, but only 12% were comfortable or very comfortable performing weight management and 44% were not interested in developing competence with weight management procedures. Greater comfort was associated with physician age, comfort with gastroenterology procedures, and practice setting. Among respondents, 48% were not sure or felt uncertain of the effectiveness of adult weight loss surgery. There were few associations between physician characteristics and effective treatment for obesity. Most respondents agreed that obesity needs to be managed in medical centers and specialists should provide the treatment.

Heterogeneities of the RNA population in nucleoli of Xenopus laevis cells. The RNA content of nucleoli and the distribution of the rRNA over the different nucleoli of Xenopus laevis cells were investigated by means of fluorescence microscopy. The use of a double-fluorescent probe, PN(U) and PN(C), made it possible to detect the presence of unique or common probes in the purified nucleoli, respectively. The application of a mathematical modeling procedure made it possible to estimate the proportion of the RNA species and the distribution of the different RNA species over the different nucleoli.
