Adobe is introducing a series of new design features for digital media showreels in application that will help marketers design more compelling, creative and sleek video content. McCraw said Adobe would give more details on the features at the Adobe Max Creative Summit in late May, but here are some of the highlights of the new features Adobe is spearheading in the new PIP module, which will make it easier for content creators to “Pipe” video content into their websites, mobile apps or social platforms.

A second feature will allow video content to be automatically compressed and optimized.

And finally, there is the “PIP transfer” feature that allows content creators to quickly transfer from PIP to a project in another application or client.

“This is not only a re-imagination of how we will be making reels going forward from PIP, it’s a thing of beauty to create those videos with PIP,” McCraw said. “What we are introducing are features that will allow anyone to make more compelling videos for their content marketing.

I have had a few issues with Lightroom, including opening and importing projects that have previously worked. This usually isn’t very disruptive except to say that I sometimes wonder what went wrong and the reason for the situation. I do not always find this information readily available. Sometimes I am given the error message, but that information is not always provided on forums like this one. When there are serious issues, such as in this instance, I find it frustrating to be in the dark and would appreciate being informed of what I may or may not have done to cause a problem.
