Lightroom is now capable of exporting more than type. Now you can sort images by type, keyword, description, art board, albums, keywords when exporting, or mood. You can even choose individual keywords to export images that contain those specific keywords. Relationships can be added to references and you can import a catalog in which those relationships have already been created. All this not only makes exports faster and easier to create, it makes organizing and arranging images both easier and faster. Filters can be applied to the entire project, too. In addition, the ability to add multiple Clips has been improved. This means you can add a blank border or fragments to a slide. Typically you would use the Fill functionality of a brush to add a border, for example, but the process has been sped up in the new version. And though the Border Control details are lost, you can still use a border brush to add a new border to an image or to change an existing border. And if you exit without saving a project, we haven't lost anything - it's all working in Lightroom 6.

On the bright side, the annual subscription price happens to be the cheapest I've ever seen it for a Lightroom upgrade. You can save as much as 99% off the list price with the current coupon. So if you've been waiting for Adobe to drop the price of Lightroom from $695 to the $79 price it was when it first dropped its price in 2013, you've finally got your chance.
