Software is fun when it works well. Others look at the same set of tools we have access to in Photoshop and sometimes come away from the experience frustrated by the difficulty of performing certain tasks.

The benefits of a subscription model are well established and can be easily summed up by the business segment that stands to benefit most from it: ad agencies. With the inclusion of "a higher customer satisfaction score" and CS6's more user-friendly interface and workflow, it certainly feels like Adobe has the right right from-the-ground-up approach to address the needs of one of the key segments of the industry. An advertising agency user has to manage a constantly growing client list and express its brand ideals through creative and highly optimized imagery. At times, this involves more than just a technical or creative goal to achieve, but an overriding need to be consistent across all of their work. While there has been improvements to the speed at which Photoshop accepts authoring, such a feature alone does not create a product that Adobe can, without question, expect to dominate in its niche. And the most obvious problem lies in the fact that, at present time, it is not yet possible to use Photoshop with the community of programs (instead of, for example, with GIMP) without losing essential controls and features. Based on the extensive sets of limitations, we can only conclude that heavy Photoshop users will either keep their subscription or purchase it outright. For the rest of us, this is a powerful program that is consistently pushing boundaries, offering new and promising tools, and providing user-friendly interfaces that foster incremental growth.
